Chapter 1 by Sergei Makarenko

Hello word!

Chapter 2 by Kitiōn

Word was born from that first utterance of sound waves.

Word became a single distinct meaningful element of speech

Word was alive & started to divided into multi-word verbs. Firstly phrasal verbs, then followed prepositional verbs and lastly phrasal-prepositional verbs. Adjective's soon developed to modify the nouns & pronouns, and proper adjectives that derived from proper nouns.

Word was positive, comparative, superlative. Word was now language & fast becoming ruler over nationality, religious affiliation and culture.

Language was now a virus.

Chapter 3 by jeffyb

And Word really liked it up the butt. He even had a "handbook" about it.

Another way was to get the traders to use your language, but they would just mix them up with all the other languages and talk with you as if you were a pidgin.

However you do it, it's important to get your artists involved. Poems, plays, sagas, songs ... everybody listens, they say "More!", and the local artists scramble to learn the new lingo so that their audiences will still think they're cool.

Conquering other cultures by force and then making everyone use your language instead of theirs turns out to be really difficult. Swallowing up their language into yours, or the other way around, works better.
